

Staff photo by Eddie Moore

Deborah Sue Griffin from Carolinas Raptor Center, shows an eagle to students at East Union Middle. The school adopted a similar eagle with money raised from recycling.

Recycling is for the birds

East Union uses project profits to adopt endangered eagle

By Win Baker Correspondent

MARSHVILLE — It's working! East Union Middle's Recycling Club has found a way to protect the environment and make money.

Every Thursday the club, sponsored by seventh-grade science teacher Joseph Sproul, puts out containers in the parking lots.

On Thursday afternoons the Recycling Club sorts and separates the tin and aluminum cans brought in, using Sproul's truck to carry them to H&H, a scrap metal business on N.C. 205 in Marshville.

Since the project began the group has raised more than the $300 needed to adopt a bird at the North Carolina Raptor Center in Mecklenburg County. By adopting an eagle, which is the school's mascot, they hope to protect an endangered species.

The Raptor Center is one of three havens for injured birds of prey in the United States.

"I really am proud of the kids," said Sproul. "They have all worked so hard. The money used for the eagle, I feel, is helping out the environment in both ways."